“Relive to Remember” had a positive and eye-opening impact on people who didn’t have a full understanding of the Japanese American prison camps. The details of this event are not taught enough to kids in school, much less kids who were in school 10, 20, or 30 years ago. In this sense, many people are/were lacking access to learning about an extremely important and still very relevant piece of US history. Many adults and kids today don’t know what happened to Japanese Americans during WW2, and our film educates people on what happened during that time, why, and how it affected people. By having survivors tell the audience their personal experiences, it helps the audience connect better to the story and fully understand just how much emotional trauma came with their experiences, and how it is very crucial to understand the repeating patterns of racial injustice.
